Traditional Russian bells, during their 9-century history, played three different roles:

- ✚ as church bells, they accompanied Divine Services, being the only liturgical musical instrument of the Russian Orthodox Church;
- ✚ as signal bells, they served as city assembly (veche) bells, ship's bells, Russian coach (yamschitskiye a.k.a. valdayskiye) bells, buoy signal bells, military sentry bells, fire bells, tower clock bells, and later as railway station and locomotive bells, etc.;

and during the last two centuries,

- ✚ as orchestral musical percussion instruments actively used by Russian composers in their musical pieces, one of which, 1812 Overture, composed by Pyotr Il'yich Tchaikovsky (1880, Op. 49), became very popular in the U.S., often performed during the Independence Day holidays.

Since Fort Ross' inception in 1812, Russian bells already served Fort Ross in the first two capacities— first as sentry bells at both Fort's sentry boxes located diagonally in its Northern and Southern corners, and after 1824 as the church bells at the belfry of Fort Ross Holy Trinity – Saint Nicholas Chapel.

Today you will hear Russian bells used in their third role, as a soloing orchestral musical instrument zvonnitsa rung by Ty Gale, Bellringer of St. Nicholas Orthodox Church in San Anselmo, California.

Blagovest Bells of Novato, California, the sole promoter of Russian bells and bellringing in the U.S., made its first wooden zvonnitsa in 1999 and is providing it for the Festival on a free loan.

The 4-bell peal used in the zvonnitsa was cast for the belfry of Fort Ross Chapel in the Urals in 2012 by Pyatkov & Co., a famous modern Russian bellmaker, to complement the existing Fort Ross Chapel bell.
